

A Word Or 2

“Our own Black Nation, the Republic of New Afrika, is Our only Real solution”

1877: Black Reconstruction Ends

There was a deep divide in the United States that started as soon as white people from Great Britain began occupying the so-called new world. This divide intensified in the years leading up to the Revolutionary War in 1776, as each section was suspicious of the intentions of the other section. They fought as one to gain freedom from Great Britain and won because the British were not fully committed to the war. Then they began to argue about who would control the political and economic direction of the new country they had created, an argument that resulted in a civil war that broke out in 1861 and ended in 1865.

The whites from the North, with the assistance of Black participants, emerged victorious, but did not possess enough of an advantage to force the southern whites to toe the northern line. So northern whites decided they would use Black People to force southern whites to act right. The northern whites enacted the Reconstruction laws, which put the powers of the national government in the hands of Black People in the South and southerners sympathizers, and a period began that gave Black People the mystic illusion that they were finally going to get the fair treatment they were due.

However, there were millions of southerners who refused to change. They engaged in a 12 year struggle against northern whites, southern sympathizers and Black People to preserve their way of life. During that 12 year period, the southern whites made it known they would accept some changes provided they were allowed to put the Blacks “back in their place.” During that 12 year period, the northern whites got tired of supporting the Blacks who had made it possible for them to win the war, took back the power of the government that they had put in Black People’s hands, and took away Black People’s ability to defend themselves against southern terrorists. White northerners and southerners agreed to a white power truce, dehumanized and terrorized Black People again, and went on about their merry way.

1877: The Bottom Line

When Blacks and whites in the United States unite for progress, the initiative falls short of its goal and Blacks suffer fundamentally and disproportionately, while white sympathizers and hardliners come to an accord and go on about their business.

2016: White Reconstruction Begins

In 2008, white sympathizers used the presidential election to “prove” that racism was no longer an issue in the United States. So many of them voted for a Black man that he became President, and punctuated it all by re-electing him 4 years later.

But there were at least 150 million white persons who were thoroughly pissed off by that development. They bided their time and waited until one of their own fortuitously took center stage, and the leaders among them haphazardly stumbled into a white power course of action that would keep one of their own as President forever. They began studying and learned that, even though they were the minority, the constitution left enough wiggle space for a large minority like them to legally seize and maintain control of the federal and most state governments.

Immediately after the war for independence against Great Britain, each state wanted to make sure that its powers would not be trod on by the federal government. They came up with a constitution, the Articles of Confederation, that achieved that end, and went about managing their affairs.

Within 3 or 4 years, it became clear to them that the Articles of Confederation was not good for business, so they agreed on a new constitution that was business-centric and granted extensive powers to the federal government. The new constitution overshadowed the rights and powers of the states, but it did not explicitly eliminate many of them. A lot of wiggle room was left to be manipulated, and they decided they would use it to gain control of the entire country.

The white hardliners generated a second deep divide, and made it clear that what they want is the only acceptable outcome. The Blacks and their white sympathizers have united, but the white hardliners have the constitution on their side. Plus, they know that as time passes the whites who sympathize with the Blacks will get tired of the Black struggle and abandon them.

2021: The Bottom Line

If history is prologue, white sympathizers and white hardliners will overcome their differences and go on about their business. The Blacks will be abandoned by their white “friends” and suffer needlessly for not having built their own independent power base.
